A LONG ISLAND WORK OF ART.

Curious Relic of Early Farming Days Exhibited at a Store in the Town of New Amsterdam

In one of the ancient Long Island villages on the South Shore, whose first settlement was made by the Dutch, the town of New Amsterdam was under the rule of William the Testy, in a quaint old homestead on its main street, was seen the other day a curious, crude wooden, in a frame that was once gaily, and hung in an inconspicuous corner of a neat little store, a relic sacred for the prying eyes of the iconoclastic summer boarder.

It was a roughly executed, but it told an interesting story. The picture was labelled, "The Farm Residence of Mr. John Blank," and in all probability that gentleman had been the first owner of copies made to send to his friends and relatives. His picture and that of his wife, in small miniature, topped the upper part of the landscape, on the background of orchard and meadow. The man's face was framed with throat whiskers that reached from ear to ear, and on each side of his mouth a pair of long, close-shaven chin tufts bunched stuck stiffly out at an acute angle. His hair was brushed in rolls on the top of his head, and his mustache was stiffly curled, like snail silt in a blanket. Firm and straight-mouthed likewise was the lady, and her coiffure was of a design popular in the fashion-plates of the first half of the century.

Below them was a view of the house, with several fine barns in the fore-ground. In front of these stretched a

Careful inquiry developed the fact that many years ago, when the disciples of laquerero were few and their pogger pictures costly, they used to travel about the country, making pictures of farms and their owners for a few dollars, printing a certain number of copies and sending to the farmer a sufficient quantity for him to demonstrate to his friends and relatives who had gone "out west" that there were

Advertise Their Age.

A fact remarkable to our civilized women is the one that Alaska squaws make their ages public. They wear a piece of wood or bone in the lower lip, the size of the ornament indicating the age of the owner. When a girl marries her lower lip is pierced, and a peg of wood the size of the lower lip of a pea inserted. As she grows older this is increased in size until it is almost as wide as her chin, and half an inch high. The result is naturally unsightly, but it answers the purpose, and, besides, it is fashionable.—Golden

 Well, what are you going to get out of this? There is an aged minister of the church, a venerable man, who

Bless your souls, that's been the first step; my voice rose up and said, "If I could only preach to you younger people, for, though I can't see much, I believe this: Whenever you get into a place and your heart is breaking, you will look a little further into the woods, you will see, caught in the place, a substitute and a deliverance." My son, God will provide himself. I said, "I will not thank you, mother, for that short time. I could preach back to you for a minute or two and say, never do that again.
